German carmaker Porsche is considering cutting 4,000 jobs and merging divisions in an effort to cut costs, according to German media reports.

German business newspaper Handelsblatt reported Sunday that an additional 4,000 jobs could be cut in administration and management, after the company laid off 2,000 temporary workers in 2025 and announced further cuts of 1,900 jobs until 2029 .

The move comes after Porsche’s net profit plunged from €5.3 billion in 2024 to €90 million in 2025 , because of falling sales to the Chinese and North American market and roughly €3 billion in U.S. tariffs.

CEO Michael Leiters has vowed to “comprehensively restructure” Porsche and cut costs to make it profitable again. In a press release in March, he said he wants to “make the company leaner, faster and the products even more desirable” as part of the company’s so-called Strategy 2035, which includes reducing the number of models it produces.

Porsche is also weighing a 30 percent reduction in capacity at its Weissach development site. According to Handelsblatt, the changes are set to be announced by end of July.

The carmaker, headquartered in Stuttgart, also reportedly reassigned two top managers — head of European sales Iryna Kauk and head of overseas and emerging markets Christiane Zorn — while the head of Porsche’s business excellence division, Maryam Djavadi, is set to leave the company as Leiters plans to merge the German and European sales divisions, and cuts the overseas and emerging markets division.

“We are currently reviewing all areas to see how we can become leaner and more efficient. For now, the focus is deliberately on our management structure,” a Porsche spokesperson said.
