PARIS — A deal between France and Germany to strengthen protections in the Industrial Accelerator Act in exchange for a loosening of combustion engine rules should be finalized "in the next few hours or in the next few days," the bloc's industry chief Stéphane Séjourné said Tuesday.

Speaking at POLITICO's Competitiveness Summit in Paris, Séjourné said he hoped the agreement would help "break the deadlock, particularly in the European Parliament" on the IAA.

Séjourné's comments come a day after French President Emmanuel Macron said a grand bargain with Germany was "imminent."

The French commissioner said he was open to more "flexibility" on the combustion engine ban and emission rules — so long as decarbonization targets are not fully abandoned — if that helps to unlock talks on the IAA.

"This agreement, in fact, is a European agreement, and that is why it is so important. It should make it possible to green-light the IAA," Séjourné added.

POLITICO revealed the Franco–German bargain in July. Séjourné is hoping the agreement will ease tensions in the European Parliament, where a minority of lawmakers from the center-right European People's Party — mostly from the German delegation — have sought to reject or substantially weaken the proposal.

The IAA dispute lies between supporters of an opt-in system — where trading partners would need to qualify before receiving preferential treatment on the European market — and backers of an opt-out system in which the EU would move to exclude partners that fail reciprocity or other conditions. Many of those who back the opt-out option are German EPP lawmakers.

Séjourné called the debate irrelevant, stressing that what matters most is reciprocity with countries the EU works with.

"European public funds should be used primarily for public procurement," he said. "Our goal is to keep production running smoothly, so we can't expand the scope of Made in Europe indefinitely if our goal is to manufacture in Europe."

On the EU's broader trade policy, Séjourné stressed the need for Europe to continue to build credible "trade defense instruments" while arguing that China "rightly believes that they won their power struggle with the Trump administration a year ago on trade."

Séjourné was also asked for his thoughts on a member country unilaterally cutting its contribution to the EU, as proposed by the far-right front runner for next year's presidential election in France, Marine Le Pen — a move he said would be akin to leaving the bloc.

"I don't know of any gym member who goes to the gym and doesn't pay their membership fee to gain access," he said.
