About Timothy Puko

Timothy Puko covers metals and mining out of the Washington office. Among broader coverage he'll be exploring the worldwide race for battery minerals and the geopolitical friction around mineral supply chains. With nearly a decade of experience in the US capital writing about energy and climate policy, and the Trump administration, Tim is also feeding into the team's analysis of political risk for oil and gas markets, clean-energy development, sustainability and energy security. Tim arrived at Eurasia Group after more than 15 years as a journalist, most of it covering energy markets, and the intersection of business and government. He was most recently at The Washington Post after spending eight years at The Wall Street Journal. For the Post and the Journal in Washington he covered groundbreaking policy shifts during two presidential administrations. That included scoops on greenhouse-gas regulations and corporate sustainability, international negotiations over climate change and energy supplies, and the struggles to revive the US mining industry. Before that he wrote about energy investors and commodity traders in New York. Tim started covering energy and resources in the early years of the fracking boom in his hometown of Pittsburgh where he wrote for the Tribune-Review. He has spent days in the deep underground mines of Pennsylvania, Ohio and Wyoming, and written about fights over uranium in the Four Corners states, copper in Alaska and rare earths in California. He received a master's degree in journalism from Columbia University and his bachelor's degree from Northwestern University.
