【要点】

- ・ EU は公共調達で「ヨーロッパ製品優遇」政策を進めているが、大多数の加盟国の有権者は自国産業への優遇を望んでいる。
- ・ 調査では 23 の 25 国でヨーロッパ製品よりも国内産品を優遇する政策への支持が高く、平均で国内優遇支持は 50% 超、ヨーロッパ優遇支持は 50% 弱となった。
- ・ ポルトガルとスペインは国内優遇支持が最も高く 50% 超だが、ラトビアとエストニアでは支持が 10% 未満と国によって大きな差がある。
- ・ ドイツは国内優遇とヨーロッパ優遇のどちらについても支持が弱く、20% 未満の純支持率となっている。
- ・ EU 執行部が提案した産業促進法では、公共調達（EU 経済の約 17%）を通じてヨーロッパ製品の需要喚起を目指しているが、EU 各国は国別ではなく製品ベースの優遇制度への見直しを提案している。

Brussels wants 'Buy European' but voters lean domestic

BRUSSELS — As the EU works on a major industrial policy bill that would create a “Buy European” preference in public procurement, the message from voters in most member countries is that governments should spend money on homegrown industry, according to a new poll by Public First .

The poll, shared exclusively with POLITICO, lands as European policymakers fight over how much preferential treatment EU-made clean tech should receive under the proposed Industrial Accelerator Act . The European Commission presented the bill in March and wants to get it adopted by the end of this year.

The EU executive aims to shape demand for European products through the act by giving them an advantage in public procurement, which accounts for some 17 percent of the EU’s economic output.

EU governments have already proposed recasting the Commission’s proposal , linking the European preference to products rather than countries. Meanwhile, the European Parliament has yet to agree on a common position.

In 23 of the 25 countries surveyed by Public First, people expressed greater support for public procurement rules that gave an advantage to products made in their own country compared with those made elsewhere in Europe, Luke Shore, managing director at the Project Tempo think tank, told POLITICO.

Support for a domestic preference was slightly above 50 percent on average, while support for a European preference was just below half. However, there were big disparities among EU countries.

Germans have “similar attitudes” when it comes to giving preference to domestic suppliers or those from elsewhere in the EU; net support for both measures was relatively weak at below 20 percent.

Meanwhile, “across most of Europe, the sentiment is nationalistic before it is European, whatever the size of the country’s industrial base,” said Shore, who analyzed the poll findings for POLITICO.

National sentiment

Portugal and Spain are the most supportive of national and EU preferences — with net support of over 50 percent for national origin and just under 50 percent for a broader European definition. Latvia and Estonia show the lowest net support for such rules — at less than 10 percent for Buy European and in the teens for Buy Domestic.

Public First surveyed more than 26,000 Europeans between May 21 and June 18 in 24 EU countries and the United Kingdom. No survey was conducted in EU members Cyprus, Luxembourg, or Malta. Questions focused on the impact of the Middle East war on energy prices, energy security, and the cost of living; price caps and public procurement rules were among the policy options favored most.

While more than half of respondents want Europe to make its own clean tech even if that ends up slowing the green transition, support for trade protections drops if people are told that higher prices could result.

Support for energy and industrial policies is “cost-contingent,” Shore said. “Faced with a cost-of-living crisis, voters back protectionist policies — but only if they don’t raise prices.” When asked about tariffs on Chinese tech, only 35 percent of respondents supported the idea when told it could lead to price increases.

With its self-imposed year-end deadline for finalizing the IAA looming and the Commission due to present its Public Procurement Act in early September, the polling suggests Brussels faces two political hurdles to selling Buy European: support among voters weakens when it comes with higher prices, and they have a stronger national preference.
