

Canada: Collapse of US trade talks risks further escalation

【要点】

- ・ 米国とカナダの貿易交渉が8月22日の期限直前に決裂し、米国のセクション338関税が20億ドル分のカナダ製品に発動された。カナダ首相カーニーは交渉チームに協議中止を指示した。
- ・ カナダは報復関税を同額実施する方針で、さらなる報復合戦のエスカレーション懸念がある。既にセクション232関税で打撃を受けているカナダ州が追加打撃を被る見通し。
- ・ 両国は合意がほぼ妥結していたと主張しており、週末の再協議や秋の再開の可能性がある。ただしルトニック商務長官による自動車関税引き上げの働きかけが最後に交渉を阻止したとされ、ホワイトハウス内の対立が障害となっている。
- ・ セクション232関税の削減幅が主要な争点であり、鉄鋼・アルミ関税が50%から25%、自動車関税が25%から15%への引き下げなどが報告されていたが不十分だった。
- ・ 今後の合意には、親合意派を支持するトランプ大統領の介入が必要となる可能性が高い。

Collapse of US trade talks risks further escalation

What Happened

Trade negotiations between the US and Canada broke off shortly before the 12:01AM deadline on 22 August, when US Section 338 tariffs on $20 billion worth of Canadian goods came into effect. Canadian Prime Minister Mark Carney instructed his negotiating team to suspend talks and return to Ottawa.

Our Take

The collapse of talks risks further escalation. Carney indicated that Canada will impose dollar-for-dollar retaliatory tariffs in response to US Section 338 tariffs on a range of Canadian products. Although Section 338 tariffs were primarily intended to jumpstart negotiations (see: Washington revives Section 338 to drive stalled USMCA talks with Canada , 21 July 2026), they will disproportionately affect Canadian provinces already hit hard by Section 232 tariffs on autos, steel and aluminum, and lumber. Carney will face domestic political pressure to follow through with retaliation, with public opinion favoring a hard line despite the economic cost. For now, Eurasia Group maintains 30% cumulative odds that USMCA negotiations stretch into 2027 (see: Bilateral protocols are Trump's 'zombie' USMCA endgame , 30 April 2026).

A deal was close and could be revived. Both sides are blaming the other for the collapse of talks but indicate that the agreement was largely finalized yesterday. That the collapse occurred on a Friday night gives both sides the weekend for an eleventh-hour revival, a possibility given US President Donald Trump's public silence on the deal's collapse so far. Talks could also be resuscitated in the fall, after a cooling-off period on both sides. The reported role of Commerce Secretary Howard Lutnick in scuttling the deal at the last minute by pushing for higher auto tariffs, however, points to a higher threshold for reaching an agreement, with internal White House divisions a key barrier.

Section 232 tariffs were the likely sticking point. Eurasia Group warned that the deal could collapse if tariff reductions, especially on autos, were insufficient for Carney to sell domestically (see: US tariff delay points to phase one deal , 19 August 2026). Prior to Lutnick's reported intervention, reports indicated that steel and aluminum tariffs could fall from 50% to 25% with a tariff rate quota; auto tariffs could drop from 25% to 15% with exemptions for US content; and 10% lumber tariffs could have been removed, though other duties would have remained. This was probably the least Carney could accept—he already faced blowback for concessions and failing to achieve further reductions. Reaching a deal in the future will likely require that Trump intervene in favor of pro-deal voices like US Trade Representative Jamieson Greer and against figures like Lutnick and advisor Peter Navarro.
